

125 MAIN STREET

IT WAS NOT UNCOMMON in the early days to move houses in Park City. Architectural features of this two-and-a-half story frame building suggest that it had been constructed prior to the turn of the century and relocated on the present site around 1910, however there are no ownership records or other evidence to verify this theory. The exterior of the building is virtually unaltered. One of Park City's four remaining boardinghouses, it is still used for lodging.

151 MAIN STREET

THE BUILDING AT 151 Main Street was another boardinghouse that was operated as The Royal by Jennie Peterson. The Great Fire of 1898 stopped at these brick walls. Vacant during the depressed 1950s, it has since been restored as a hotel and steak house.

227 MAIN STREET

OWNERS OF THE BOGAN MINE built the boardinghouse at 221 Main Street around 1904 in response to the "Boardinghouse Bill" passed a few years before which permitted miners to live in boardinghouses other than those operated by the mining companies. During the flu epidemic of 1918, the building served as an emergency hospital.

In 1940, one of Park City's dreaded fires demolished the roof. Six dormers were eliminated when the house was remodeled. Although presently called the Imperial Hotel, the establishment now operates as an apartment house.

221 MAIN STREET

JOE GROVER, A CHINESE entrepreneur and owner of over 500 buildings in Park City, once lived in this home at 227 Main Street. During the Depression, Grover converted it into a hotel and had a new facade constructed by trading meals for labor. It has been renovated again in recent years.

*"Walking Thru Historic
Park City, by Ringholz
& Bea Kummer*

